

The Challenge of Scotland's Changing and Ageing Workforce

Three years on from the introduction of the Age Regulations, few employers would argue that age doesn't matter any more. In fact, as surveys bear out, age discrimination still continues, though that is only part of the story.

The other side to the coin is that the population is getting older and many informed observers believe the real issues are not just about age discrimination. Rather, they would say, we need to understand the more holistic concept of age management. How can organisations recruit and retain older workers? 'How we did it' examples can be a starting point. Age management demands a strategy and it requires proactive interventions to achieve positive results. It is a classic case where a strong partnership relationship can achieve a 'win-win' for organisations and employees.

The Senior Studies Institute of the University of Strathclyde and TAEN are collaborating to bring you this seminar, starting with an overview of how changing demographics are affecting the local employment landscape, followed by an examination of the legal developments since the introduction of the Age Regulations and then going on beyond compliance with the law to analyse an age management response to the risks that demographic changes pose to unwary organisations. .
